Dear Parents & Caregivers

You have come to New York City with your children seeking safety, freedom and a better life. We want to give you support and made this guide with you in mind.

Caring for the Whole Person - Mental Healthcare is Key!

New York City government offers shelter, health, and social services for your family. Support for the emotional wellbeing of your family is also available to help you build a healthy life for you and your children. Remember that both mental and physical wellbeing are equally important parts of overall health!

What is mental health?

Mental and physical health are equally important parts of our overall health. Mental health deals with feelings, thoughts, and actions — it affects how we relate to ourselves, others and the world — the way we handle stress and make healthy choices. For our children, their growth and development, how they play, learn, cope with challenges, reach milestones and function well in home, school and the community—are all dependent on their mental health. Overall, mental health and physical health go hand in hand, influencing each other in many ways.

YOU can take proactive steps to strengthen and protect your children’s and your own mental health by developing healthy habits and coping strategies, fostering a safe and nurturing environment for your family, learning more about mental health and social emotional resources - so that you and your children can adapt well to change, and cope with life’s challenges, and lead meaningful, healthy lives!

Why are mental health resources important?

As an adult caregiver who arrived with children in your care, you have encountered many unknowns and risks, you have gone through challenging or even scary situations. Now that you are in New York City, you may continue to face some unfamiliar things that can be hard for you and your young ones as you try to settle in and start a new life. Many people who have had to face challenges and hardship find themselves worrying often about things, feeling sad, having angry feelings; they may have trouble focusing thoughts, and become forgetful.

They may find themselves having a hard time falling asleep or sleeping too much, and their appetite may also be affected. You may be experiencing some of these symptoms, or you may see this happening to your children too. These are very common reactions to having faced big challenges and hardships.

For example, according the the United States Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, about 9% of children in the United States have anxiety conditions that have been diagnosed by a clinician. See more facts about childhood anxiety and depression. Symptoms may pass with time, but sometimes they last longer, and it is a great idea to get help to return to your normal self, to feel at ease again. You can recover. All these symptoms can happen because of the experience of migration.¹

Did you know that the experience of migration impacts children's mental health?

These are examples of reasons why the stress of migration, leaving one's home to a new place, affects mental health:

- Many new and unfamiliar experiences
- Difficulty communicating due to language and/or cultural differences
- Family separation and loss
- Being treated unkindly or unfairly.²

There is hope...

Many things can help you and your children feel better and cope with hard things you have faced. It is good to do these things to keep your child healthy.¹

- Attending school and social programs
- A safe place to live
- Caring and trusted adults in the family
- Creating a daily routine
- Exercise
- Healthy eating

How to use this guide?

The ready-to-use information included here can be used digitally on your phone or on a computer. Click the link next to each picture below to view the guides. Next to each link, there is information about how to use each guide and the age group it is for.

This guide will help:

1. Children and teens cope with stress
2. Pregnant people and families care for themselves during pregnancy and nurture infants in their care
3. Families access mental health services

Note: This guide only focuses on mental health for children and caregivers. It is not a complete resource for all social service and mental health services in New York City. Please look at the NYC Office of Asylum Seeker Operations website for more information.

Mental Health Toolkit For Caregivers

We at the Mayor’s Office of Community Mental Health encourage self-care and community care, understanding that healing comes in many forms. It is normal to have feelings go up and down, sadness, anxiety, worry, fear, anger or guilt.

This is a list of things to do to help you cope—to gain a sense of calm, feel in control, and find hope. Look and try each one at your own pace. There is professional help when needed. When you learn coping skills, you will know how to take care of the well-being of you and your loved ones, for now and into the future.

Be kind to yourself:

Take as little as 1 minute each day to care for your mental and emotional health (e.g., say a prayer, take a few calming breaths, do a gentle stretch, etc.). Be compassionate to your own needs. Notice the different feelings you have and try not to judge yourself for how you feel.

Watch and chat:

Regularly talk with your children, watch their moods, and notice any new challenging behaviors. Show your care and love; be accepting towards their feelings. To care for your teen(s) or young person(s), be interested in their day and give them space when they need it.

Create a new routine:

For parents and caregivers, think of a new ritual you can do as a family to make new memories and positive moments. This can be a short walk after dinner together or talking about your day before bedtime.

Connect with supportive adults:

For parents, be in touch with your children’s teachers so you can find out how they are doing at school, share your concerns about their emotional health or behaviors with their teachers.

Build your mental strength and resilience:

Choose an activity or resource below and use it with your loved one to build healthy skills.

Learn about signs of stress:

Read about common and normal reactions to difficult experiences or trauma, and when you need to reach out for more help. See the many educational guides below.

Find trusted support:

You may be far away from friends and family, and it is important to build or re-build a circle of support for yourself. Slowly make new friends, find new community, go to a church or place of worship, and stay connected by phone or on social media if possible.

A Circle Of Care For Your Children

There is a saying “It takes a village to raise a child.”
Who are the members of your care team?

Parents and Caregivers:

Think about who makes up this “village” for you in New York City? Fill in the picture below with the names of people who help. Step-by-step, you can build a group of support for you and yours.

People who work in the community are part of your circle of support.

Your circle of support might be made of hospital or healthcare workers, teachers, members of your faith-based community, interpreters, lawyers, case workers, shelter workers, and others. They are a part of this village.

As a parent, you may be one of the first people to see changes in your child’s behavior or emotions that worry you. If you want professional mental health help for your child, you have to agree that it is okay with you that your child talks to a mental health worker. You will be asked to sign a form letting the mental health workers know that when your child talks to them, it is okay with you.
